SIMILARITY OF CRIMINALS.

General Characteristics of All Nation nlities Are Very Much the Same.

With those who are normally constituted from the moral standpoint national features and special characteristics of costnenance are in general well defined, where broad differences provail between the races, such as distingpish Spaniards from Germans or any other northern people. Nor would a French or ftalian face be easily mistaken for an English one.

But with members of the criminal classes, especially those of a criminal ancestry, the question of nationality is not so readily determined. Havepoint in connection with criminal physiognomy is that it is to a large extent independent of nationality. There is a sameness about all criminal faces amounting to an obsecuration of the ordinary national type." "The German criminal," says the same authority, "Is not very unlike the Italtan, nor is the French unlike the English." Yet, generally speaking, the distinction between such countenances is well marked. M Joly, a French eriminologist, gives it as the result of his observations that on a comparison of criminal faces of various nations, by studying the photographs of some 60 it was difficult in many cases to discern their nationality.
